And, as you allude to, automation enables holders of vast sums of capital to not redistribute that money through wages.

Ian Millhiser @imillhiser · Apr 8
That allows them to horde political power, as well as economic power. And so the government loses its will to seek solutions.

J.D. Vance @_DVance1 · Apr 8
Have you seen the Rothwell piece on licensing? It is excellent, and is relevant to your point about wages (which I agree with)

Call me crazy, but it'd be great if we could enact reform that didn't make the working and middle class pay more for health care.

Replying to @JDVance1

There is a way to do that, but it requires scaling back the "essential services" requirements for a basic health insurance plan.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · May 3

Eh. Repealing essential services without a lot of other structural reforms (and premium support) probably doesn't help much

Kelly Johnston @johnston_kelly · May 3

You really don't know much about this issue, do you? There is a way through refundable tax credits and more market options

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · May 3

Refundable tax credits = premium support. And "more market options" is a good idea, but simply repealing EHBs w/o those reforms isn't enough

If you see an article extolling how cheap Medicaid is without acknowledging its abysmal health outcomes, you should be skeptical.

There are many reasons to oppose undoing the Medicaid expansion absent some alternative, but "Medicaid works great on the cheap" is not one

I'm honestly surprised by the number of people who think "the market economy created a lot of prosperity" is a controversial statement.

All evidence suggests things got a lot better before 1920 too. But I chose 1920 as a benchmark because official mortality rates haven't been kept much further back for all areas

Medicaid through the lenses and the adults who did not. Two rounds of findings have been published in the New England Journal of Medicine, which can be summarized, in part, as follows:

- Medicaid increased access to care and health care use, and improved self-reported health. One year out from the lottery, the adults who gained Medicaid were 70% more likely to have a regular place of care and 55% more likely to have a regular doctor than the adults who did not gain coverage. Associated with more routine preventive care, Medicaid also increased the use of preventive care such as mammograms for 50% and cholesterol checks for 35%, and the Medicaid adults had more outpatient visits and hospital admissions and used more prescription drugs. Finally, the researchers found that being covered by Medicaid increased self-reported health. Compared with the uninsured adults, the Medicaid adults were 25% more likely to report that they were good to excellent (health became four to five points healthier on a 100-point scale) in the months in the last six months, and 19% more likely to screen negative for depression. The findings two years out from the lottery showed a persistent increase in coverage-related measures of financial strain and increased access to care and health care use, and improved self-reported health.
- Medicaid improved adults' mental health markedly. Medicaid's impact on physical health remains inconclusive. Objective clinical data collected on both groups of adults two years after the lottery drew that, relative to being uninsured, having Medicaid for two years was not associated with significant changes in depression. Gains in physical health were more limited: while Medicaid did increase the detection of diabetes and the medications to treat diabetes, it did not have a statistically significant effect on cardiovascular risk, on control of high blood pressure or high cholesterol. The researchers note that their study lacked sufficient statistical power to detect changes, and that many of the poor outcomes are, in fact, within the range of clinically meaningful changes that would be expected if Medicaid were effective. The authors also identify multiple factors that may mitigate the impact of coverage on clinical outcomes, including unmeasured barriers to access, missed diagnoses, inappropriate medications, patient noncompliance, and ineffectiveness of treatments.
- Medicaid virtually eliminated catastrophic medical expenses. Catastrophic out-of-pocket spending (defined as costs exceeding 30% of income) was nearly eliminated among the adults who gained Medicaid coverage. Also, the likelihood of having medical debt was reduced by more than 20%, and having Medicaid helped a significant share of adults avoid unpaid medical bills. Medicaid's financial effects on health care costs, including borrowing money or skipping other bills to pay medical bills and being relieved treatment due to medical bills in the past six months.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate this year. I thought seriously about running in August 2017, but decided that the timing was awful for my young family. Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organizations are on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and we still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

Thanks to everyone who encouraged me to run, but it's just not a good time. A bit more color below.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate th s year. I thought serious y about running in August 2017, but dec ded that the timing was awful for my young fam y. Some th ngs have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our R se of the Rest fund has ra sed $150 million to invest n early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprof t organ zation s on the verge of bringing an add ction special st into Oh o to help fil some s gnificant treatment gaps, and ve st l got a fam ly that needs more of my time than a pol tical campaign wou d perm t. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organizations is on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and we still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. Thanks to everyone who encouraged me to run, but it's just not a good time. A bit more color below.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate this year. I thought seriously about running in August 2017, but decided that the timing was awful for my young family. Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organizations is on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and we still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

Great point from @SteveCase: building an ecosystem that allows innovation to thrive from the ground up is a better strategy for long-term job creation than paying companies to move to your area

This is why I trust Ben Shapiro. He has retweeted multiple rebuttals to his original criticism of Kavanaugh without comment, let alone snark. This will only cause me to trust him even more and seek him out in the future

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy--among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people (most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty--and, yes, her lack of a filter--are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a 2L. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy--among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty--and, yes, her lack of a filter--are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a 2L. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a 2L. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy--among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people - most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty--and, yes, her lack of a filter--are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a 2L. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a 2L. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy--among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people (most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty--and, yes, her lack of a filter--are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. This is great. There's a lot of world class technology developed in Ohio (and the midwest more broadly) that languishes in academic institutions instead of turning into products that change people's lives. Hopefully this is the beginning of a new approach.

I think Lind is also too rosy about managerialism. But even if we think the German model is good, it cannot be imported to the US, a la carte, from on high. The theory hits the practice of suddenly shifting >2/3rd of the US economy into a totally different governance model

But yes, I can imagine a good Warren doppelganger that still liked school choice, was skeptical of day care subsidies, but would take on Wall Street, intellectual property laden trade deals, and other forms of vulture capitalism

But I'm afraid this Warren is off the deepend

Samuel Hammond @hamandcheese 2h
It cements my view that someone with Warren / Lind's mood affiliation is better to come out of the GOP, where they'd be free to buck identity politics and be honed in on any anti-market excesses.

To my shock doctrine piece: History matters

My tweet is obviously sarcastic, but I think this entire China/NBA spat reveals a striking blind spot that exists among so many policy thinkers: why do something about China when we can complain on social media. Complaining is better, right?

If you watch this debate closely, you'll see virtually every self-defeating "conservative" attitude on display: the idea that there is a mystical distinction between power exercised by a corporation and a government; the lack of humility after three decades of elite failure, etc.

JD, do you think impeding China's growth ought to be a freestanding US policy goal? If it were then a trade deal would be self-defeating, no? Objective wouldn't be trade on different terms but less trade period And if that's the objective, what's the limiting principle?

   Where's the humility from Bob Lighthizer and the trade warriors who have gotten this thing horribly wrong thus far? Here's a paragraph from his filing in the WTO dispute with China recently in multiple parts

   The more likely way the policy fails is by helping to tip the US economy into recession. Which is a shame, because there were more effective and more sustainable ways to apply pressure to China on these issues.

    But here's the thing: if a policy, however well intended the goal, imposes such costs, and engenders so little resilient support, that it results in its patron losing office before its envisioned goals can be realized, is that a successful policy? Maybe it's a deeply flawed one.

This is valid, Patrick, and something I worry about. But it's also super complicated: maybe it fails now, but creates long term political momentum for a more productive (and successful) outcome.

      I tend to think Trump (and the issue based opinion polling that I know a lot of federal officeholders are seeing) has actually permanently altered our posture towards China in a good way. Even if a particular policy fails.

Reshoring supply chains and decoupling these economies can't be accomplished in this administration or in the next, given the scale integration. It's a decades long, painful transition.

I've heard Cass speak. He lost me when he shrugged off losing the gains from trade (not just with China, but the world) as just something we'd have eat, for a better cause. I don't think he has the slightest idea how impoverishing the economic autarky he envisions would be.

I was just in Taiwan talking about these issues with trade, foreign policy and nat. sec. officials. I think China hawks in US and Taipei want this to be a grand ideological struggle between good and evil, but that's not how Trump views it ... at all. It's about the trade deficit

We all get heated. These are issues that matter, and I think you're a good man

Clark Packard @clark_packard · 20m
The point here is that a lot of the so-called "elites" have struggled w/this issue. There aren't easy answers and a lot of the think tank community is operating in good faith trying to put forward a better approach. No one I know thinks the pre-Trump status quo in China is OK.

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 14m
A few things: 1) the tweet that annoyed you was aimed at a broader point where you+Patrick disagree w/me--how skeptical conservatives ought to be of power. We didn't even discuss how willing I'd be to go after orgs like the NBA punitively. 1/x

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 13m
2) I tend to think people undervalue how much the conversation has genuinely shifted, and the admin should get a lot of credit for that (especially USTR), even if you disagree with the blunt instrument of tariffs.

3) I'm sure there are many acting in good faith, but I don't like the mimetics of this whole debate. There is a "legitimate" and "smart" side, and there is the extreme minority view. So it's useful to go after elites and previous failures--the same dynamics were at play in 1990.

By withdrawing this app for these stated reasons. Tim Cook is allowing his company to be a character witness on behalf of Chairman Xi in the dispute over Hong Kong. Is this what he meant by changing things through "engagement?"

It's staggering how poorly the NBA is handling its PR crisis. In the Silver era it's been used to puff press and is coming apart at the seams in the face of real scrutiny. It just keeps doubling down on cowardice and intolerance

Dylan, I completely agree that we all support different versions and it's about where to draw the line. But Beto is talking about actual houses or worship. This is the most aggressive place to draw the line. You couldn't go farther than he wants to go.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 3h

In 2020 Dylan will argue that orthodox Christians are guilty of child abuse for teaching their kids about their faith. In 2024 he'll advocate civil penalties. In 2028, criminal ones. Our politics has the potential to go much further, unfortunately

Matt Jensen @MattHJensen · 2h

We have a mainstream presidential candidate arguing that churches ought to lose their tax exempt status for the crime of not agreeing with him. I am certainly alarmed. (And don't be so sensitive about a little sarcasm.)

David Neumark @NeumarkDN · 57m

No, it's for potentially violating rights established as Constitutional. You might still argue whether this should bear on tax exampt status, but it's not just an opinion

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 40m

The question about what it would mean for a church to violate this particular right is interesting, but not relevant here. The question posed to Beto wasn't about the violation of rights, but about "opposing" rights (in the version I've seen)

This is a solid summary of a pretty interesting and important report on the VC industry. Some obvious takeaways: most venture investors aren't very good, they make a lot of money off of fees but not performance, and the industry is pretty risk averse. 1/x

There s a flip s de to this dynamic, what I call "imp icit adverse se ection" Founders, Andreesen, et al don't need new sources of capita , because they are good So many third time funds wi ing to take cap tal from new investors are willing to do so because they need money

This isn't always true, of course. Some third time funds want to raise a much larger fund, so they need new check writers. But this poses its own risk: there's a very good argument that venture simply doesn't scale, and that a good $100m fund will be an awful $400m fund.

So, my guess is that one prob em in venture is that institutiona money s biased toward mediocre follow on funds. They're often getting access to the funds that no one should want access to. /finis

Th s is a so d summary of a pretty interest ng and mportant report on the VC industry. Some obvious takeaways. most venture investors aren t very good, they make a lot of money off of fees but not performance, and the industry s pretty r sk averse 1/x

> Jawad Mian @ sm an
> 1/ From 1997 to 2012, less cash was returned to investors than invested n VC. Given where we are in the cycle, revisit this venture study for a sobering read of what a bear market for the industry may look ke Not unlike hedge funds today I suppose

One of the less obvious takeaways is that most institutional investors invest in venture in precisely the wrong way: they are unwilling to back first time funds, and so they chase name brand funds that don't need their money. This chart is relevant:

The more interesting question is what would happen if they actually abandoned the old orthodoxy on economics. They still probably lose the socially progressive suburbs. Maybe they actually pick up enough votes to consistently win. Who knows, but the current combo is not working

Some clarifying things
1 Dreher thinks my rejection of culture war is rebellion against my youth. I wrote a 40 page history thesis on Jonathan Edwards and the making of American evangelicalism. It was cathartic. I'm not bitter about my upbringing because I understand it deeply

Anthony Barr @AnthonyMBarr · 29m
2 Dreher says I'm a progressive, and he links to a piece I wrote, with a subtitle "what do we love about Elizabeth Warren?"
anthonymbarr.substack.com/p/the-technocr
He doesn't mention that the whole article is me interrogating myself/Warren for being inclined to technocratic thinking
Bad faith

Anthony Barr @AnthonyMBarr · 26m
3. Dreher says I'm a closet progressive who lacks the self awareness to realize it. I'll just say this: there are conservatives who spend their time gate-keeping (though moaning about "identity politics") and then there are conservatives who read a lot of Burke. I'm the latter

2) it lowered first births among lower income women. I'm supremely uncomfortable with "divorce is good because the good women had babies and the poors didn't" type of arguments.

I'd encourage folks to look beyond the title of the post, which doesn't summarize the author's claims. She's saying that divorce laws that make divorce easier are good, not that divorce is good. In fact, she cites Gruber to note that divorce is bad for outcomes /1

Scott Winship @swinshi · Jan 5
It's true that she should have cited Gruber's finding that easier divorce actually worsened child outcomes, but it doesn't make sense to criticize her for making an argument she's not making

What if divorce LAWS that make divorce easier cause low-income men to be more careful about getting women pregnant? (Since they might find it hard to get out of a marriage. Or perhaps because child support laws also get reformed in favor of single moms when divorce gets easier)

1. Can't believe the @uscensusbureau is taking sides on a major family policy issue and doing so with such a one-sided presentation of the research on divorce with this article, "The Upside of Divorce?"

3. This @uscensusbureau article doesn't come close to offering a fair minded summary of the research on divorce laws and child outcomes. For instance, doesn't cover @MIT Jon Gruber's work on divorce liberalization's impact on children. In fact.

Gruber had this to say about the @uscensusbureau report: "That is literally the opposite of the conclusion that I draw in my study. I find that easing divorce laws is bad for child outcomes."

There are also elements of this piece that border on sociopathic. "Easier access to divorce has been shown to reduce the number of births..." in a piece about the "upside" of divorce--yikes

Yes, summarizing that as something that is a benefit or "upside" borders on deranged, especially given fertility trends. (And the paper she references in the next paragraph is about the benefit of compensating people in the wake of divorce, so I don't get your point.)

The paper referenced in the next sentence claims that the legalization of divorce in Chile raised fertility among highly educated women

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · Jan 5

I'm not sure if it raised fertility, though it claims to have raised first births. But two big caveats, as I read the paper: 1) the divorce law combined with a financial incentive, and the author treats those first birth effects as a consequence of the financial incentive; 1/x

There's a lot I'm still grappling with. One of Lind's most interesting ideas is that working class institutions are most effective when given effective veto power (think unions in the economy; churches in the culture) As I say in the review, there's a lot of Leo XIII in here

I also think it's possible that the realignment Lind envisions doesn't happen on the Right. Maybe it doesn't happen at all. In which case things will be really chaotic and depressing in the coming decade.

Anything good you'd point to on this topic? I'm obsessed with this question of why we are—or at least seem—so bad at building things.

As always Marc, I appreciate you adding perspective. The one thing that irks me is the presumption (by some) that their own Appalachian story is the "real" story, despite the thousands of people I've heard from, from the region, who got something out of the book. Glad you did!

(Btw, I spent a lot of time growing up in Appalachia before my great-Mamaw died, but the book is really about the Appalachian migrant experience. I don't believe I've ever been unclear about that, and if so, it was not intentional.) My best to you.

Em, I'm sorry you feel that way. I say (as a guess, from the perspective of a child) that my mom and stepdad together, for the approximately six months that they both had jobs, made a good salary. I think they probably did. Unfortunately not enough.

I also say, explicitly, that the "pull yourself up by your bootstraps" explanation for my own success is "bullshit," and that I had a lot of help from my Mamaw, my extended family, and yes, even my nuclear family.

That's the thing, Mr. Vance. I wouldn't presume to speak for all Appalachians (and I wouldn't write about rust belt culture, since I'm not from there.) And I damn sure would not insinuate that their poverty is because of some moral failing or defect in their character or culture

I appreciate the personal response, JD. The subtitle of the book being a memoir of a culture gives that impression. It's great you were able to "rise above your raising", as they say. We disagree on a how much the struggles of the rural poor are attributable to character

Can anyone point me to the best (English language) reporting on what is actually happening on the ground in China right now? Based on what I've seen, the range of possibilities is everything from "kind of bad" to "Walking Dead Season 3." I have no idea what's going on.

Two additions to Charles's analysis. 1) the despair part is still really important, given the rise in suicide and alcohol related deaths over the last two decades; 2) the supply/synthetic focus of this can sometimes ignore a dynamic effect that I think is difficult to quantify

Right, but we know that despair is a risk factor, and that various disincentives do reduce addictive behavior. There's something depressing going on with the continued use of synthetic opioids, given that everyone now knows using street supply is like playing Russian roulette.

Exactly right. One piece of this is that the desire for real community that people like @Chris_arnade have documented is often expressed as a love of both local place and also of country. The culturally progressive language you hear at Bernie rallies can get pretty insane.

A political take I'd like to read: why Bernie has performed so poorly with white and black working class voters, but has done reasonably well with Latinos. Some of this is compositional (ie Bernie does well with the youth and Latinos are a younger demo). But that's not all of it.

The Latino vote is very young, less ensconced in things like southern political machines. It's also a vote he was splitting about half and half with Clinton in 2016, so he's basically just retaining support there

The big uncertainty is how sensitive the toggle is between mobility and spread. This is confounded by any number of other variables, but the sense I get from Korea is that pretty substantial disruptions (not quite China-level mass quarantines) work.

   To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

   This, from @phl43, is one of the smartest things I've read about coronavirus. Warning, it will satisfy neither the "It's just the flu" crowd nor the "Imperial College model is Gospel" crowd https://necpluribusimpar.net/are-we-headed-toward-an-unprecedented-public-health-disaster/ …

I watch the Italy numbers obsessive y, in an effort to gauge how effective their lockdown efforts have been. Hopefully, their numbers w ll flat ne starting now. But as @ba aj s notes here, there's some evidence Italy s understating how many are dying

Yesterday's numbers, while horrendous, at least show deceleration. So that's good (with the obvious caveat above). But I'd be really interested to see all-cause mortality from the first week of March 2019 and March 2020.

I assume some causes of death, like auto accidents, are declining. But that is outweighed by the increase in deaths not just from COVID-19 but from people unable to get care for illnesses. Presumably many heart attacks and strokes are going untreated now.

Exactly. In a state of true health system stress, lots of people without the virus suffer.

We don't know, but a huge spike in mortality just as the crisis took off would at least suggest that COVID19 had some role to play--both indirectly through system stress and directly.

Possible, though, that some other disease or condition is at work.

Seems to me that until C 19 is confirmed for each death, those numbers should be marked with an asterisk.

Hospital capacity is completely overwhelmed and people probably aren't getting other serious medical issues addressed!

Do we know if the data is skewed because less people are being tested as a result of the lockdown? This would apply only to number of cases - but are fewer people leaving their home to be tested now, thus artificially lowering the new case count?

I think you're misinterpreting the quote. The meaning is that if a person dies in a hospital (and that person has tested positive)--but also has another condition like asthma --that death is treated as a COVID death. That's not much different from many countries.

It is possible people are dying in greater numbers from normal medical emergencies (heart attacks, strokes, falls, traumas, cancer) because the hospital system is so stressed with COVID19 patients they cannot adequately treat them and elderly are triaged to die

Correct. The most plausible interpretation (to me) of the story about Bergamo is that you're seeing both unreported direct deaths and a spike in indirect deaths caused by system stress.

I watch the Italy numbers obsessively, in an effort to gauge how effective their lockdown efforts have been. Hopefully, their numbers will flatline starting now. But as @balajis notes here, there's some evidence Italy is understating how many are dying.

in a hyperglobalized world, is it even possible to open things back up? We can't make Japan, China (still not fully up and running), and Western Europe open up. Our ability to prevent recession may be limited

Two, our economy is so financialized that young people especially tend to have a super abstract perception of it. I'm a big fan of a massive stimulus right now. But eventually, you have to actually make goods and services and send them to people. Stimulus doesn't work forever.

There is so much condescension packed into this sentence I can't even begin

The Road to Coronavirus Hell Was Paved by Evangelicals

Trump's response to the pandemic has been hamstrung by the science denialism of his ultraconservative religious allies.

By Katherine Stewart

Ms. Stewart is the author of "The Power Worshippers: Inside the Dangerous Rise of Religious Nationalism."

of every pastor is behaving recklessly, of course, and not every churchgoer in these uncertain times is showing up for services or disregard for the scientific evidence. Far from it. Yet none of the benign uses of religion this time of crisis have anything to do with Mr. Trump's expressed hope that the country would be "opened up and just raring to go by Easter." He could, of course, have said, "by mid-April." But Mr. Trump did not invoke Easter by accident, and many of his evangelical allies were pleased by his vision packed churches all over our country."

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich.

I'm not even talking primarily about the policies. That's obviously a big part. But the effort to equate conservatism with garden-variety liberalism (and obsession with the individual)—to the point of rejecting the value of seeking a common good—has been bad in many ways.

I'd also argue that conservatism "on those terms" was a response to a number of huge cha lenges that ex sted at the t me (Cold War, stagflation, etc). Did they give rise to new challenges? Yes, just as our response to today's challenges will give rise to new ones in turn.

Not enough books. I read the Chernow book and Grant and am slowly making my way through "The Once and Future King." I read most everything that comes out of National Affairs and American Affairs, plus a lot of tech and politics magazines.

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich

> Erick Erickson @EWErickson
> Just don't think we can ever define conservatism as "common good" because conservatism is about liberty and freedom of the individual. It is the support of the individual against the collective common good

I am may be reading this incorrectly, but I took this sentence as meaning was 6 percent below baseline. Meaning before corona hit, there was a larger pool of vulnerable people because mortality had been pretty low. But that had changed in light of corona.

   I don't read Italian, but the chart in the report seems to end in mid March, before the worst hit. My only argument is that we won't really know the true toll until we're a few months post crisis, when we can look at the all cause numbers.

I think it's the only reasonable way to read the tweet. On the other point, there has been a lot of interesting stuff coming out of think tanks. That isn't inconsistent with a view that the broad thrust of the post-war right is a donor funded fusionism that failed.

But who's re,ecting the common good? Some fo ks are uneasy about mposing hotly contested moral princ ples on those who don't share them, that's a reasonable position, and the principal basis for the opposition to the Vermue e piece

Do you think he actually rejects the idea of a common good? I think he's uncomfortable with imposing contested moral ideas on people who disagree with them as Vermuele has suggested. You might disagree with him on that, but that doesn't mean he's endorsing Randian individualism

I disagree with you on trade policy, but I care about the common good and came by my views honestly; sure AEI & Hoover folks do too. We can disagree on policy without impugning each other's motives as donor funded (all think tanks are donor funded) dismissers of common good

   Seems like this is a 'messy data in bad correlations out' scenario. To your point there are big questions, IMO, about causation vs. correlation in a lot of these numbers. Asymptomatic people that have Covid-19 will die as will symptomatic people not yet diagnosed.

Yes. Especially true given how early we are (8,000 deaths out of 330mn). So we won't know for a while. The way the CDC projects flu deaths is by adjusting upwards after a bunch of data has come in. I imagine the death count will be very unclear for a while.

   Yup! This all goes back to the lack of diagnostic capacity, I think. We just don't know and should definitely not take what China says at face value. So given these two points: we needed to test and do it at scale like last month. Are we close?

First, there's an important distinction between end products and components. Second, because pricing at the high end is primarily a function of a government monopoly (ie PTO), you can't waive away the loss of important generic drugs (especially antibiotics) because they're cheap.

Finally, there's something a little weird about saying our pharmaceutical supply is fine while our greatest geopolitical foe is threatening to withhold critical components. The Chinese don't make idle threats. Maybe they know more than misinterpretations of investopedia articles

if you look at the death rate increase over average ("excess deaths" in the medical terminology), the models are just as badly wrong, as mortality rates generally down overall. They are just attributing a lot of non-virus deaths to the virus

In other words, if all of this distancing--some forced by policy, some by organic behavior changes--drives down traffic fatalities, drug ODs, etc, that will drive down mortality in a way that has nothing to do with COVID. Presumably there are ways to adjust, but it's complicated

What I want you to notice is that there are still revisions reaching back to the first week of 2019

Lyman Expand the House Stone, AKA @ymansto .. · 10m
This revision pattern is entirely normal It s very typical for early release data to undershoot the final number by 15,000 deaths or more G ven that an average month is just 45 60k, that's a very large undershoot!

Lyman Expand the House Stone, AKA @ymanston .. 9m
What is also clear here is that it takes about 8 16 weeks for nationwide data to become a reliable metric of total deaths

Lyman Expand the House Stone, AKA @ymanston. · 8m
Some states report very quickly. New York has very rapid death-reporting, which is very helpful. But you simply cannot take CDC's "100% complete" indicator to indicate that reporting is over. It just means normal mortality levels have been reached

In the meantime, early indications are, if anything, a bit pessimistic. We got (relatively complete) New York data for week 12. Reported COVID deaths in week 14 in New York amounted to almost 100% of seasonally normal deaths in that week

The only path to low deaths is continue the recent and fairly break neck pace of declining growth rates in mortality. Which means we need the absolute numbers of deaths per day to not rise above 1500 or so.

Think the need to understand what's happening is important. Given globally connected economies, this kind of thing will happen again. We'll need to have an understanding of what kind of damage can be done, how much can it be mitigated, at what cost, etc.

   In the meantime, early indications are, if anything, a bit pessimistic. We got (relatively complete) New York data for week 12. Reported COVID deaths in week 14 in New York amounted to almost 100% of seasonally normal deaths in that week.pic.twitter.com/fsmL4K27fD

   Even assuming 20% of COVID deaths would have happened anyways, and making modest accountings for likely revisions to latest weeks, New York (city + state) is going to experience an extraordinary spike in deaths.

   Saying, "well ACTUALLY this disease would have killed millions but we have modern medicine" is silly: the point is the disease was less disruptive than it might have been because we have medicine. Likewise, if social distancing reduces deaths, then it was a less severe issue!

   In many historic epidemics, the leading killer was famine or murder, not disease. In Ecuador, India, and the Philippines, that may happen again in some places. The effect of COVID simply "is" the spike in all cause mortality.

   After Hurricane Maria, there was dithering and quibbling over how many people should be counted as killed by the hurricane. This is idiotic. We know how many people died in a window of time, and about how many people would have died based on seasonality and population traits.

      But I'm actually asking a different question: how do we figure out, in real time, how much damage the disease is causing? And how do we adjust our response accordingly. I don't think the all cause numbers (at least, the unadjusted ones) are going to tell us as much.

Italy is a disaster, but one northern town reported only 15 percent antibody presence for COVID. The town mentioned above that had higher antibody presence also had sky high mortality. The story is pretty consistent: more COVID usually means not ceably more death.

In Iceland, estimates are that .6 percent of the population has COVID antibodies. In Telluride, a Colorado town, fewer than 1 percent tested had definitively positive results. Finally, genetic data can provide some insight into how long a disease has been around.

The phylogenetics we have suggest the virus sprang up in late November in Wuhan, and first moved to the United States in January. This is not a timeline consistent with widespread transmission by March. See here: medrxiv.org/content/10.110

"1 COVID is not very dead y, with comparable (or even lower) morta ty than the flu."
There's obv ously a ton of uncertainty on the overall mortality rate th s early. But there are a few suggestive data points

J.D. Vance @_DVance1 · 28s
Germany and South Korea are often cited For some time, both had morta ty rates below 1 percent (seasonal flu is .1 percent). But as the d sease has progressed (COVID takes a long time to kill people) they've both seen their mortality r se to 1 8 percent (ast time I checked)

J.D. Vance @_DVance1 · 28s
celand s another case study for the opt mists. Their mortality is currently 3 percent. But they've had very few cases (serology testing suggests about 6 percent of the country is infected) and active containment. It s always tough to draw conclusions from a small sample size

J.D. Vance @_DVance1 · 28s
What s more indicat ve of how this w ll progress? The many countries with thousands of cases and morta ties ranging from 2 to 10 percent? Or a single nat on with 1,500 cases? Even if you do want to use Iceland

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 32s

Evidence suggests that Italy is substantially underreporting deaths. So that 1.7 percent number is likely low. twitter.com/[illegible]. This is not the flu

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked

The phylogenetics we have suggest the virus sprang up in late November in Wuhan, and first moved to the United States in January. This is not a timeline consistent with widespread transmission by March. See here: medrxiv.org/content/10.110

The data is very incomplete. This preliminary view could be wrong. But so far, there's no evidence of widespread transmission. Note that this doesn't mean there aren't a lot of asymptomatic cases. There definitely are, just not so many that we're anywhere close to broad exposure

"3. The COVID death count is way overstated, as many people are being counted as COVID deaths without proper documentation."

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m
There's a way in which this claim is sort of interesting as an academic argument: effectively, how do we track deaths in an accelerating pandemic, where it isn't possible to test everyone who's dying?

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m
A lot of folks have picked up on CDC guidelines that don't require a test to confirm a case of COVID. Others have focused on the "with/or" question. Just because someone dies with COVID doesn't mean that's the cause of mortality. A few responses

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m
First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

This was the most plausible optimistic scenario to me. Serious epidemiologists suggested it. But with more data, I no longer think this is likely. The best way to test this is by seeing how many people have COVID antibodies.

First, in Denmark, a place that's been hit reasonably hard, one serological test measured 1,000 people in the Copenhagen metro area, and another 244 in Central Denmark. 2.7 percent tested positive in Copenhagen. 0 percent tested positive in Central Denmark.

Italy is a disaster, but one northern town reported only 15 percent antibody presence for COVID. The town mentioned above that had higher antibody presence also had sky high mortality. The story is pretty consistent: more COVID usually means noticeably more death.

There's obviously a ton of uncertainty on the overall mortality rate this early. But there are a few suggestive data points:

J.D. Vance ✓ @JDVance1 · 2m
Germany and South Korea are often cited. For some time, both had mortality rates below 1 percent (seasonal flu is .1 percent). But as the disease has progressed (COVID takes a long time to kill people) they've both seen their mortality rise to 1.8 percent (last time I checked)

J.D. Vance ✓ @JDVance1 · 2m
Iceland is another case study for the optimists. Their mortality is currently .3 percent. But they've had very few cases (serology testing suggests about .6 percent of the country is infected) and active containment. It's always tough to draw conclusions from a small sample size

J.D. Vance ✓ @JDVance1 · 2m
What's more indicative of how this will progress? The many countries with thousands of cases and mortalities ranging from 2 to 10 percent? Or a single nation with 1,500 cases? Even if you do want to use Iceland as a lower bound, the mortality there is 3x the flu

J.D. Vance ✓ @JDVance1 · 2m
A suggestive data point I've seen on mortality is actually from an Italian town, where serological testing suggested 65 percent had COVID. t.finance.yahoo.com/notizie/corona record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

J.D. Vance @DVance1 6m

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m

But the truth is that we won't know until we can look at the all cause mortality numbers, and see how they've spiked or not in response to COVID. (To be clear, I have some qualms with how useful the all cause numbers will be here, but they're probably the best we'll have.)

Finally, I think the "with/or" debate misunderstands something pretty fundamental about comorbidity. Most people who die of a respiratory illness (including, yes, the flu) aren't totally healthy people.

8:29 PM - 7 Apr 2020

J.D. Vance @DVance1 1m

If a dude with a heart condition gets the flu and dies, but would have lived another 10 months absent influenza, did he die of the flu? This shit is complicated, but that doesn't mean there's a conspiracy to inflate COVID deaths

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m

TLDR: all of the mortality estimates are imperfect right now. Health systems are doing their best to record the info accurately, we won't know for sure what those numbers look like for weeks (at best), but there's nothing unique about COVID in this respect.

TLDR: all of the mortality estimates are imperfect right now. Health systems are doing their best to record the info accurately, we won't know for sure what those numbers look like for weeks (at best), but there's nothing unique about COVID in this respect.

Many have argued that all cause mortality numbers are dropping lately (can't find the tweets). This is wrong: CDC usually takes months to fully tabulate the data. There's been a lot of misinformation here, a suggestion that pneumonia deaths are dropping because health officials

This was the most plausible optimistic scenario to me. Serious epidemiologists suggested it. But with more data, I no longer think this is likely. The best way to test this is by seeing how many people have COVID antibodies

J.D. Vance @DVance1 Follow

First, in Denmark, a place that's been hit reasonably hard, one serological test measured 1,000 people in the Copenhagen metro area, and another 244 in Central Denmark. 2.7 percent tested positive in Copenhagen. 0 percent tested positive in Central Denmark.

Italy is a disaster, but one northern town reported only 15 percent antibody presence for COVID. The town mentioned above that had higher antibody presence also had sky high mortality. The story is pretty consistent: more COVID usually means noticeably more death.

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

In Iceland, estimates are that 6 percent of the population has COVID antibodies. In Telluride, a Colorado town, fewer than 1 percent tested had definitively positive results. Finally, genetic data can provide some insight into how long a disease has been around

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

The phylogenetics we have suggest the virus sprang up in late November in Wuhan, and first moved to the United States in January. This is not a timeline consistent with widespread transmission by March. See here: medrxiv.org/content/10.110[illegible].

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

The data is very incomplete. This preliminary view could be wrong. But so far, there's no evidence of widespread transmission. Note that this doesn't mean there aren't a lot of asymptomatic cases. There definitely are, just not so many that we're anywhere close to broad exposure

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

"3. The COVID death count is way overstated, as many people are being counted as COVID deaths without proper documentation."

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

There's a way in which this claim is sort of interesting as an academic argument: effectively, how do we track deaths in an accelerating pandemic, where it isn't possible to test everyone who's dying?

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

A lot of folks have picked up on CDC guidelines that don't require a test to confirm a case of COVID. Others have focused on the "with/or" question. Just because someone dies with COVID doesn't mean that's the cause of mortality. A few responses

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

J.D. Vance @DVance1 7m

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked

J.D. Vance @DVance1 2m

But the truth is that we won't know until we can look at the all cause mortality numbers, and see how they've spiked or not in response to COVID. (To be clear, I have some qualms with how useful the all cause numbers will be here, but they're probably the best we'll have.)

I'm sympathetic to this argument, in part because a lot of people freak out if you even mention the economic cost. This isn't about dollar worship or stock prices - a lot of conservatives are genuinely worried about the anxiety, stress, and death that comes with a severe recession

My basic view is this: the virus is very deadly compared to the flu, it has not spread widely in our population, informal social distancing has done a lot to slow the spread (and more formal measures have helped too)

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 46s
The problem with my view is that it suggests the toggle between "return to normal" and "viral spread" is very sensitive. If the average person reduces the number of people they come in contact with by 30 percent, you get lower spread

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 46s
If they reduce that number by 50 to 75 percent, even better. R0 doesn't exist in a vacuum. But social distancing is inherently economically destructive. Even informally, even before any lockdowns

One final thought on the modeling — much of it has been "curve fitting" meaning it assumes a pretty symmetrical bell curve. But I'm increasingly persuaded that the exponential decay side of the bell curve isn't actually happening. See this data org.cs.ucl.ac.uk/myn/covid19 #r…

My basic view is this: the virus is very deadly compared to the flu, it has not spread widely in our population, informal social distancing has done a lot to slow the spread (and more formal measures have helped too)

The problem with my view is that it suggests the toggle between "return to normal" and "viral spread" is very sensitive. If the average person reduces the number of people they come in contact with by 30 percent, you get lower spread.

If they reduce that number by 50 to 75 percent, even better. R0 doesn't exist in a vacuum. But social distancing is inherently economically destructive. Even informally, even before any lockdowns

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m

This is the best paper that highlights how informal social distancing has likely already begun to flatten the curve: nber.org/papers/w26917.

So what do we do? Good question, and I don't know the answer (even if I'm right, and I may well be wrong). Continue to research good antivirals and vaccine candidates. Make everyone wear masks. Figure out how to make social distancing less economically destructive in the meantime

I'm sympathetic to this argument, in part because a lot of people freak out if you even mention the economic cost. This isn't about dollar worship or stock prices—a lot of conservatives are genuinely worried about the anxiety, stress, and death that comes with a severe recession.

On March 17, Bloomberg ran an article about the UK's approach to herd immunity, making it seem as if London was operating normally

But that same OpenTable data suggested restaurant traffic was down on March 17 by 89 percent, and had been down substantially the weeks prior. Again, this was before the UK government closed restaurants and bars.

Some have pointed to Sweden's laissez-faire approach to the virus as a model to emulate. Set to the side whether that's accurate (it's incomplete at best), Swedish economic forecasts are grim.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 4m

The most recent estimate I've seen from Swedbank is a 4 percent 2020 contraction. Goldman's late March estimate for the US was a 3.8 percent contraction (they've since further adjusted down to 6.2 percent for the US)

In other words, a lot of the social distancing appears organic, and independent of the policy response. That doesn't mean good policy can't help (or bad policy hurt), but the idea that our economy just hums along absent lockdown orders from the president and various governors

Further, China's manufacturing indices suggests continued stagnation. India is locked down. Western Europe's hospitals are overrun. Singapore appeared to have things under control, but has shut down again. Japan delayed the Olympics, and appears to be getting worse.

You can criticize globalization all you want (I do all the time). But a consequence of globalization is that you can't thaw your own economy while the rest of the world is frozen, even if concerns over the virus are overblown. American politics can do only so much.

Many experts have offered worst-case scenarios without qualifying them, thus eroding trust in public institutions when those scenarios fail to materialize.

But the failure of a given model - or more accurately, the failure of certain officials and media types to properly contextualize those models' purposes and limitations - doesn't mean that this crisis isn't real.

But the truth is that we won't know until we can look at the all cause mortality numbers, and see how they've spiked or not in response to COVID (To be clear, I have some qualms with how useful the all cause numbers will be here, but they're probably the best we'll have)

Many have argued that all cause mortality numbers are dropping lately (can't find the tweets). This is wrong CDC usually takes months to fully tabulate the data. There's been a lot of misinformation here a suggestion that pneumonia deaths are dropping because health officials

My basic view is this: the virus is very deadly compared to the flu, it has not spread widely in our population, informal social distancing has done a lot to slow the spread (and more formal measures have helped too)

5 26 193

J.D. Vance @DVance1 10h
The problem with my view is that it suggests the toggle between "return to normal" and "viral spread" is very sensitive. If the average person reduces the number of people they come in contact with by 30 percent, you get lower spread

3 13 115

J.D. Vance @DVance1 10h
If they reduce that number by 50 to 75 percent, even better. R0 doesn't exist in a vacuum. But social distancing is inherently economically destructive. Even informally, even before any lockdowns

5 16 142

J.D. Vance @DVance1 10h

Obvious caveat: I am hardly an expert. I care about this stuff for its own sake and also because in my day job I manage (mostly) other people's money, and many of them have asked me about my views on the crisis as it's evolved. So here goes

8 11 175

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
To organize, I'll start by summarizing the big arguments, and then I'll walk through each of them one by one, though many of these claims are related to one another.

3 10 131

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu.
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is already widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

21 71 269

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
3. The COVID death count is way overstated, as many people are being counted as COVID deaths without proper documentation.
4. The economic damage we're causing with COVID containment lockdowns is a cure worse than the disease, so we should end the lockdowns soon.

11 55 342

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
"1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu."
There's obviously a ton of uncertainty on the overall mortality rate this early. But there are a few suggestive data points.

10 18 146

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
Germany and South Korea are often cited. For some time, both had mortality rates below 1 percent (seasonal flu is .1 percent). But as the disease has progressed (COVID takes a long time to kill people) they've both seen their mortality rise to 1.8 percent (last time I checked).

24 22 231

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 10h
Iceland is another case study for the optimists. Their mortality is currently .3 percent. But they've had very few cases (serology testing suggests about .6 percent of the country is infected) and active containment. It's always tough to draw conclusions from a small sample size.

9 14 176

Toby Young @toadmeister 11m
You also overlook the fact that the IFR of seasonal flu fluctuates quite a bit from year to year. So the fact that the likely CV 19 IFR is higher than the average IFR for seasonal flu doesn't mean it's more deadly than the deadliest bout of SF in last 25 years. Can't compare one

Finally, I'm frankly skeptical of treating mortality estimates as hard "evidence"—they're suggestive, but if you understand the underlying inputs and assumptions, they're educated guesses.

I forwarded that thread to a number of peop e earlier today. Agree it's rational and data-based

Marc Werres @marcjwerres 1h
I'd actual y argue the opposite. There are tons of stud es that estimate the IFR, yet he cites none of them

Kaustuv Sen @kaustuvs · 1h
You're right, he doesn't. But his conc usions are directionally consistent w th those studies and the best studies I've seen on estimat ng percentage of the pop n already infected. I cha k it up to the limitations of Tw tter in referencing detailed stud es

Marc Werres @marcjwerres 1h
"Taking account of historical experience, trends in the data, increased number of nfections in the population at largest, and potentia impact of misclassificat on of deaths gives a presumed estimate for the COVID-19 IFR between 0.1% and 0.39%."

Kaustuv Sen @kaustuvs · 51m
That's one of the most opt mistic. But even with that estimate, 0.4% * 70% of US population to get to herd immunity = 1 m llion deaths in ess than 8 months in an unmitigated epidemic. Just not an opt on

Marc Werres @marcjwerres 38m
No one s arguing to do nothing. My point was simply that there is no reason to ignore the data and rea expert ana ysis that we do in fact have. I think casual observations & hunches from celebrities that are at odds w th the data and ana ysis of experts do more harm than good

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 19m
I agree we should a ways defer to "rea expert analysis," ike that from the WHO and CDC that discouraged mask wearing despite the ev dence. My goal was to give people a sense of the lower bound of poss bilit es (Ice and), and a so the way that CFR has tended to ncrease

J.D. Vance @DVance1 17m
FR estimates are inherently more difficult. But given the paper you cited includes an estimate for Icelandic infection that s 70 percent higher the number suggested by random zed PCR, I'm not sure why should take its conclusions as gospel

Marc Werres @marcjwerres · 12m
The reason the CEBM est mates are helpfu is they are updated da ly and take into account basica ly everything that is out there. Not saying t is gospel, but I think it is helpfu

I won't pretend to have read every IFR estimate. I have kept some tabs on CEBM. My sense is that it has tended to overstate total infection rate, and not totally adjusted as things have evolved. (Example, the Princess CFR is now at 1.2 or 1.4 last time I checked.)

IMO, IFR is what people really care about - how many ppl may die, what is the chance I will die - and CFR causes an incredible amount of confusion because ppl misinterpret the meaning. The range of estimates I have seen for IFR are < 0.1% - 0.9%

If I'm right, we'll have a halting return to life in May/early summer. The virus will flare up in random spots, and we won't have exponential decay in the disease curve. More "normal" than March, but in hindsight, we'll realize how bad 80 percent of normal is for productivity

One of my great influences once told me to make specific predictions about the future, so if you're wrong, you're forced to think about why. If my view is too optimistic, I think the future is relatively clear: well over 100,000 dead by the summer, likely much more than that.

If informal social distancing isn't working as well as I suspect, maybe a place like Sweden really takes off -not a few day spike in cases and mortality--but a long term march to a northern-Italy like outbreak

Lower mortality?

Of all the people tested in this state (IN) as of 4/9, we are currently sitting at a 3.8% mortality rate for known positive cases

To state that it isn't very deadly or that it has a comparable or lower death rate than the flu, you need data

JD has no data

What's the counterexample. The UK? It theoretically pursued a herd immunity approach through mid-March, but in fact had radically altered course well before the government ordered a lockdown. Sweden? Swedes are following distancing protocols, and their economy is getting crushed.

Too many people assume a level of agency that may not exist. What if the decision isn't between economic devastation or health crisis? Or, more precisely, what if the decision was already made, by something far more powerful than human politics?

I haven't seen a recent projection. But 4 percent is substantial, and when that projection was made in late March (by Swedbank, I believe), US banks were projecting 3-4 percent. I am sure we'll contract more than that, but recent Swedish estimates may say the same.

I find the idea that you can lockdown the country until we "eradicate" the disease preposterous, in part because no Western country has seen anything close to exponential decay. But I don't understand how, if we stopped the lockdowns, we foresta l major economic damage

My whole point is that this economic damage was already happening And I love to see the counterfactual. Sweden? They're definitely experiencing a severe recession, and maybe worse. Will they do better than the US, assuming they don't have another spike (big if)? Maybe?

If the argument is that there's a more effective (and practical) cocktail of responses, where you still get some economic damage, but you 1) don't get a full blown depression and 2) avoid a huge spike that induces a panic, which then affects the economy, I'm all ears

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m

One final point, I often disagree with Alex. Sometimes I really think he overstates things (we still don't have good allcause mortality figures for Europe for week 14, for instance). But one area of strong agreement: Many in the press screwed up reporting on the IHME model

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 1m

It was, at best, a clunky model for such a dynamic crisis. It claimed, from the very beginning, to incorporate "full social distancing" into its projections. Everyone: learn the purpose of these models or don't discuss them. A couple friends have gone full truther over that model

   Figured I'd reply to this. Will be brief. Basically, on the mortality point, granted, though I don't know what we do with that besides pursuing different quarantine strategies for old and young. It's clearly just a nasty disease for those with symptoms, even if you don't die.

   On the economic stuff, American GDP is heavily concentrated in big, dense cities, with lots of restaurants, bars, clubs, etc. And the evidence has grown that informal social distancing was happening before lockdowns, and that this distancing was very economically destructive.

Was cautiously hopeful I'd been proven wrong when NY deaths ticked down today that maybe we did hit the peak, but, no, other states (IN, MI, MA, PA) are surging, and the US has a new daily death high. I expect another high Mon or Tues from delayed reporting over holiday weekend

I maintain that when this is all over we'll realize how much "social distancing" was happening organically. If that holds then shutting down gardening stores will cause some real harm without ever accomplishing much on the public health side.

Some recent data points of interest: First, German researchers studied a hard hit town. High level takeaway: 14 percent of the town had antibodies, 2 percent had recent infection, .37 IFR estimate (mortality for all infected, not just confirmed cases.

I haven't found a good English translation of the paper. Assuming it holds, would be both bad (lower community transition even in a hard hit area than we might hope) and good (lower mortality than worst estimates, though still far worse than seasonal flu).

Austrian study finds 32 percent of one sample with active infection. This suggests against broad exposure, but given that it's only testing active cases (not those who had it in the past), there are other plausible--however unlikely--interpretations.

An ta an town did a s milar study after everyone had recovered from the virus. Found about a 65% infect on rate, but an overall 1% death rate in that town

Yes, though it was a small sample size (and I believe the death rate has risen to about 1.7 percent based on recent deaths). This would be close to a worst-case scenario if it held: you get herd immunity, but only if 2 percent of your population dies.

I haven't found a good English translation of the paper. Assuming it holds, would be both bad (lower community transition even in a hard hit area than we might hope) and good (lower mortality than worst estimates, though still far worse than seasonal flu).

Austrian study finds .32 percent of one sample with active infection. This suggests against broad exposure, but given that it's only testing active cases (not those who had it in the past), there are other plausible- however unlikely interpretations. https://www.cnn.com/2020/04/10/austrian-study-shows-coronavirus-cases-more-than-8-times-higher-...

I've yet to see a solid piece of evidence that the US or Europe has seen broad exposure. But still very early.

I think you mean IFR. If he's right that we're not detecting 90 percent of cases, IFR is .44 percent based on most recent death data. Because COVID kills slowly, that likely increases. Finally, we're also undercounting deaths, not just diagnosed cases, eg: https://pbs.twimg.com/media/EVQ4wURX0AUyfu5.jpg ...

Germans established IFR of 0.3 on the basis of serological data It cannot be increasing or decreas ng - it is what it i. If his 20 times figure s true then it's l terally like flu! Any undercounting of deaths is a rounding error compared to this stuff

They didn't establish that. One study found an IFR of .37 in a small town. Other studies have found .4. Others suggest it's much higher. And if NY, in the month of March, saw an excess of 4,000 to 4,500 deaths, that's far more than a rounding error when calculating IFR.

even if assume the outlandish assumption that the total death count should be increased by third as your NY example (and we also very well may be OVERcounting) suggests that's exactly a rounding error when you compare it with the 20-times augmentation of the denominator

I'm not sure what's "outlandish" about looking at all cause mortality spikes to understand total mortality. That's a main factor in calculating mortality for other pandemics. I'm pretty sure a net increase of 4,000 deaths, in NYC, in the month ending April 4 is far more than 1/3.

Big question is whether pregnant women (constantly in and out of hospital) inherently bias data. Also, given NYC infection rates, this is consistent with 10:1 or 15:1 ratio of unconfirmed to confirmed cases. Not the 100:1 I'd love to see.

That's based on 9500 deaths, at a 0.37% IFR, which gets you 2.5M cases as of 2-3 weeks ago. That would suggest ~30% infection, not 16%. So as high as this is, it's not terribly shocking given the death totals in NYC already

Fair. I'd bet IFR ends up being in 0.3 - 1.2% range when all the dust settles. That still leads to terrible numbers when everyone is susceptible. Unless that is not true as someone points out. The shape and steepness of the front end of the curves suggests it is true

SIR models are fun tools but has anyone actually gone back and tested their accuracy for past epidemics? Like is there some large forecast repository we can check to test the accuracy of these models?

Indeed, symptoms were roughly equally present in the SARS-CoV-2 positive patients and the negative ones. The only real trend here was in shortness of breath (1.4% in the positive group, 0.4% in the negative, p=0.30)

You'd really want to see follow up data on the positive cases to make any judgments, though (and look at who they excluded on the front end and why). The point of the study is not to evaluate total asymptomatics, it's to give clinical guidance in real time.

The uncertainty around asymptomatic positives and the high number of negative tests from people who are clearly infected makes me wonder if our tests are just poor. Perhaps we are looking for the wrong thing, thus finding it in places it isn't/not finding it where it should be

Certainly if the asympomatic rate held at 9 1 or so, this would be important. But I took the study as trying to figure out how much presymptomatic spread they were seeing, not trying to answer whether those cases stayed asympomatic Would appreciate the authors weighing in.

My operating assumption is that about half of COVID infections are "asymptomatic"--meaning they don't feel anything or they're mild enough that it doesn't cross their mind. If it was more like 90 percent, that would be meaningful.

My guess is we'll find true IFR (using serology testing to capture cumulative infections) ranges from near zero for the young to 5-10 percent for the very old with a population average of 0.2 to 0.5 percent.

What's your best guess?

I'm more pessimistic. If we're missing 90 percent of cases, call it an IFR of 1.1. If we're missing 95 percent, call it north of .5. That's basically my guess range.

2/They have not seen a new flood of deaths among the previously asymptomatic. But this represents a major risk for preventable deaths in the community at large, and Boston has stood up many facilities (tents, hospitals, etc) to assure isolation (pics below)

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · Apr 15
Did the asymptomatic stay that way? Or did any later show symptoms?

Stefan Kertesz, MD @StefanKertesz · Apr 15
The Boston team does not know for sure. Broadly, preliminarily, most persons testing positive without symtoms don't seem to be becoming very ill. The issue is untraceable spread to others who may, homeless or not. Boston has invested in stopping that - most cities have not.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Apr 15
Dr. Kertesz - thanks so much for this detail. Obviously we want to make sure these folks don't infect vulnerable people, but I think we are burying the lede - this is a population with a lot of comorbidities and a very high infection rate. Yet most don't seem to be becoming ill

Bruce Buff @BruceB · Apr 15
It also means this community may be developing herd immunity and while those who are self-isolating may not (at least yet). It may also explain why new cases haven't plummeted from > month of lockdown. Models are worthless as don't link causality at this level of granularity.

Importantly, this wasn't a random collection of people off the streets. It was a group of people at a single shelter, living in close quarters. The fact that most are asympomatic is definitely interesting, though you'd really want to see follow up data.

Speaking of all-cause mortality, the CDC reported just 10k deaths during the week ending April 10. The average U.S. weekly death rate is 50k+. Seems that shutdowns will do better against more frequent causes of death than C19

The CDC data trickles in over many weeks. Usually it's not complete for a few months after a given week. I would bet a lot of money that the all-cause numbers for April 10 will be much higher than 10k (and higher than 50k) when all the data comes in.

With regard to this discussion, I would like to point out that there is evidence that on total a shutdown does reduce the number of non-C19 deaths (meaning the reduction in deaths due to infectious diseases, accidents is bigger than the rise in suicides, untreated illnesses).

How do you make sense of that given how many people are still dying each day? Non-covid mortality falling? Overcounting? Or am I just misreading the magnitude of the changes?

Understood. I remain somewhat optimistic we'll get at least a meaningful drop in auto fatalities and drug ODs out of this. Maybe inapposite in Europe.

A lot of WHO's response has just been hapless and comical. But on December 31 Taiwanese officials reported to WHO medical staff in China were getting ill with the new virus, signaling human-to-human transmission. The WHO did not share the information,and that is unconscionable.

   Something is funny about these tests. With these sorts of ratios of infected to measured cases, the floor for New York infections would be 5.5 million or so, and the ceiling would be the whole city has already been infected. It doesn't pass the smell test. 1/

   You don't apply the 10 50x multiple to areas that have had a disproportionate amount of testing (like NYC). That heuristic is only useful at the current snapshot of cases on a national scale.

      As someone else pointed out to me, the confidence interval for the specificity starts in the 98% range. There were only 50 positive antibody tests out of 3330 samples they counted. Even a 1% error gets you 33 false positive tests, which would be 66% of the positives.

This is a valid point, but is that 3,000 number total excess or just excess deaths at home? It's not actually not clear what this official is even saying in the quote. 3,000 excess over that period would be lower than other estimates I've seen.

*not actually clear. Also relevant: I've seen NY officials say that during the peak of the crisis (which we're still close to), they've seen 100 to 175 excess deaths at home. That's not consistent with a spike of 3,000 from all causes, in all places.

I don't think the quote is that muddy.

NOTE: the city has reported a total of 900 "probable" #COVID deaths at home and 800 in nursing homes. But NYC averages 250 deaths at home and 160 in nursing homes a week.

Mortality is tougher because of miscounting, and death rates tend to rise over time. But this would put IFR much closer to seasonal flu, probably 2x to 3x the flu, not 10x (which has been my operating assumption)

NYC is an outlier in a lot of ways, like ~30% of the deaths are under 65. I know it sounds crazy, but makes me wonder if the way people catch it in NYC is different, e.g., the initial viral load for many cases is higher because of prolonged close proximity like subway.

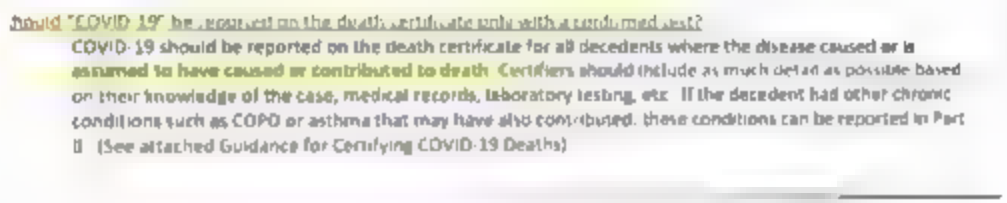
Kristy @KristyLasha · 19h

That's not true. CDC tells them to put COVID as cause of death if they even just "suspect" it.



Should "COVID-19" be reported on the death certificate only with a confirmed test?

COVID-19 should be reported on the death certificate for all decedents where the disease caused or is assumed to have caused or contributed to death. Certifiers should include as much detail as possible based on their knowledge of the case, medical records, laboratory testing, etc. If the decedent had other chronic conditions such as COPD or asthma that may have also contributed, these conditions can be reported in Part II. (See attached Guidance for Certifying COVID-19 Deaths)

Careful drawing conclusions based on positive antibody testing when actual prevalence is low

The lower bound on specificity is ~98%, so as many as 2% of all tests could be false positives. Actual positive tests were 1.5%

Hard to draw conclusions from this data,

Certainly don't want to draw conclusions, but specificity here is good and we're all looking for little rays of light in the dark. Low prevalence within the sample is definitely an issue, though I think the sample selection itself is a pretty serious issue.

Mortality is tougher because of miscounting, and death rates tend to rise over time. But this would put IFR much closer to seasonal flu, probably 2x to 3x the flu, not 10x (which has been my operating assumption)

Also you want to see how people develop. If the range of symptom presentation is 2-14 days, with a mean of 5 or 6, then you'd really want to see the progression of all these people before making judgments about whether they're truly asymptomatic.

The Boston team does not know for sure. Broadly, preliminarily, most persons testing positive without symtoms don't seem to be becoming very ill. The issue is untraceable spread to others who may, homeless or not. Boston has invested in stopping that - most cities have not.

Alex Berenson ✓ @AlexBerenson · Apr 15

Dr. Kertesz - thanks so much for this detail. Obviously we want to make sure these folks don't infect vulnerable people, but I think we are burying the lede - this is a population with a lot of comorbidities and a very high infection rate. Yet most don't seem to be becoming ill

I wonder what is the criteria, if any, for being admitted to the shelter. Is it possible they screen out those with obvious symptoms? Or, possibly, the residents self screen and self isolate outside of any shelter. Or, anyone with a cough is peer pressured to leave..

Part of the story of that study was that the standard front door screened and temperature check missed 100% of persons infected

It is very hard. Maybe (probably?) impossible. But I don't see any way around the problem. I can't think of a single successful political movement that didn't have at least some of the elites, and you can't have those folks if you won't pay them.

Why do they seem impractical here? Two months ago, getting people to wear masks - let alone submit to dubious stay-home orders - seemed impractical. Once people realize we cannot consume more than we produce, pressure to resume productive activity (thoughtfully) will be irresistible.

If you actually speak with politicians, prospective and current, it's obvious how pernicious the influence of the donor class is. The same with nonprofit entrepreneurs on the Right. You want our money? Better toe the party line on trade, taxes, and immigration.

It's not "whining" to acknowledge this fact and try to persuade a few class traitors. Descriptively, I actually agree with Sam's point: it's not easy to encourage donors to shift. It may, in fact, be impossible to collect a critical mass. But it is necessary.

😂 Don't want to overinterpret one study, but I think it would mean 1) not that many people have it in Denmark and 2) it's probably something like 5 times as bad as the flu in terms of mortality.

Looking at the COVID map and the demographics of death, one random hypothesis I have is that the profess ona c ass in high GDP, high inequal ty regions brings the disease in, and then withdraws from soc al life in a way that ensures the working c ass gets slammed

But the big European countries who got crushed, and also account for the biggest share of GDP, distort the Eurozone number. Compare Sweden to Denmark, Norway, Netherlands (all of which locked down) and it's not at all clear that Sweden has saved its economy.

The Scandis are all tied together for manufacturing due to integrated markets. Lockdown's main impact is on services - Amazon is still open. Can't find any Scandi services PMI except Sweden. But disparity between it and ALL others is orders of magnitude

It's not just hypothetical for me. My two parents are very sick and we've considered moving them into a nursing home. But they are currently stable isolated in their home. But if I lived with them I might feel safer having them in a home

There's much we can improve on elderly care in the US. Agree that our current structure needs a lot of rethinking

J.D. Vance @,DVance1 May 10
The CFR (as opposed to the IFR, or better yet, elderly IFR) isn't a great metric, especially on March 15 (much has changed since then--for instance, Germany's CFR now well over 1. The most recent data I've seen suggest about half of Italy's COVID deaths come from care homes

J.D. Vance @,DVance1 May 10
, given that, the relevant questions are 1) are the elderly in Italy more likely to die in multigen homes instead of care homes (given statistic above, I doubt it, but don't know); 2) what actual conclusions would you draw from the Italy experience, given confounding variables?

I find the comparison of Western Europe to Asia more telling than the w/in culture/nation comparison. But what you really want to know is: what is an elderly person's relative risk of mortality given different living situations? I strongly suspect home > nursing home.

Economists and public health researchers have ways of learning the causal impact of something even from observational data

This branch of learning is called "causal inference" and it's basic training in the sciences which use observational data

Two institutions in particular, with relatively low populations (i.e., comparatively speaking) seem to have all the deaths. Need to look into those

Also, age / health background and stats on Covid related deaths would be helpful

If virus largely rampaged through high risk populations, & environments with high communicability, then limited benefit for continued lock downs. I've yet to hear of regular business, or airplane flight, with high # of cases. It's tight quarters and/or forceful breathing (choir)

We now have at least a few cases ACROSS THE COUNTRY from January. That includes Ohio, New York, Illinois and California. And I bet the farther back we look, the earlier we will find evidence of the virus

Pradheep J. Shanker @Neoavatara · May 11
One complicating fact on this: if the virus was here by January (and I think we'll find a few cases at least in December), then this puts even more blame on China and the WHO, who only admitted human transmission at the end of January

10 44 195

Pradheep J. Shanker @Neoavatara · May 11
Remember: France has confirmed cases in December,. a full MONTH before scientists thought it was there

I'm pretty skeptical of October. January is consistent with the phylogenetics I've seen. Plus, if the antibody testing is correct, there's no way it got here before late January (unless the reproduction rate is much smaller than we expected, which would be an interesting twist!)

Not trying to point this comment at you in particular, but I don t think the "long line" anecdotes are more telling than some of the other data points (A so, I wou dn't say the lockdowns don't matter at all)

J.D. Vance @,DVance1 May 11
At least in the US, there's a pretty cons stent trend in the geolocation data (ad,usting for municipal rules and lockdown dates) that shows re at vely consistent behavior across many ega regimes. SafeGraph has good info on this

I agree that there's much that needs to be solved with respect to our treatment of the elderly. Your hypothesis of COVID deaths may be right

If you look at the Philly Children's Hospital Study (which the WH CV Task Force is using) cases in key counties in GA, TX, IA etc are trending higher than they should be. This is also the 'quiet' period. Trend lines go up starting this weekend in states that open early.

Second, after the last few years, can we please have some humility from our media and leadership? There's a lot we don't know, and making absurd predictions about the future ("mass death in GA by May!") erodes trust far more than a few random protesters in statehouses

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 13h

I remember two months ago saying the IHME model was garbage. I was of course pilloried for rendering a judgment without expertise. My core argument was that it overestimated death on the way up and underestimated it on the way down. I have been proven right in both directions

14 20 253

J.D. Vance @DVance1 · 13h

The people who treated that model as some Platonic truth were wrong, and their repeated failures to show humility have created real mistrust in public authorities. We should all be wearing masks in public (indoor) spaces, but I understand why many mistrust that guidance

Not because the virus isn't bad, but because people are freaked out about it. And when there are little spikes in new cases and deaths, people will naturally retrench. An implication of this view is that it will be much harder/impossible to "return to normal" in dense areas.

Part of this problem is that those who are skeptical about lockdowns are either ignorant or willfully misleading about probability. If a study says something is 70% probable, and that thing doesn't come to pass, the scientists are portrayed as not only wrong but lacking humility.

RobV @RobVarak · May 13
The reality is that the model accounted for the error, and "humility" is a non sequitor in the context of the scientific method. Might as well ask the doctors to be more ironic.

I agree there's a tradeoff between economic activity and viral spread, but I remain skeptical (with admittedly limited data) that the lockdown orders themselves are driving this. If I'm right, the states that end lockdowns won't see radically different behavior from those that do

Philippe Lemoine @phl43 May 11
Today we reopened in France and there was a 500m long line in front of a clothing store During the lockdown, a McDonalds opened for one day (just the drive), and there was a 2km long line of cars. Sure, many people won't do these things even if they can, but clearly many

I think a lot of this is explained by the fact that if you ask 12 people their definition of "lockdown," you'll get 13 different answers.

TLDR: Philipe is asking why the virus hasn't spread as far as many of the models suggested it would. The serology is in, and the idea that the virus has ripped through the population is just not credible anymore. But why?

But another reason, which is perhaps even more important, is that since people won't even admit the model was wrong, there is no discussion of why it was wrong. 4/n

Philippe Lemoine @phi43 · 3h

People just say that it's because it didn't model voluntary social distancing and move on saying "nothing to see here". But again this is demonstrably not the reason, since it's still wildly off the mark even when you include voluntary social distancing in the scenario. 5/n

One possibility: spread is super sensitive to different types of social distancing, and the curve decays in a non-linear way with the introduction of certain types of measures. Which isn't a disagreement as much as an explanation for what you're observing.

Yes, something like that is one of the theories I've had in mind, mainly because of studies on individual cases of transmission suggesting that transmission varies a lot on the type of settings. Like community transmission is actually very different if it's outside or inside

Isn't the answer just a little easier than that? That epi community didn't know much about a ~2 month old virus and made assumptions using similar viruses that were wrong

Ed Gerrish @edgerrish 2h

To say "social distancing works" in a model sense means that transmission by fomites is weak and the virus needs sustained contact. That's enough to drop R0 from 2 5 3 5 to Rt~1 but why would the models know that without the data necessary to build it in?

All I see is a graph. No methodology. No pre-print. No code. Not even a background in epi or simulating PDEs, AFAI can tell. Add that to the fact he's relying on a laptop to run this and I see a hobbyist, at best, whose work should be reviewed before any conclusions are drawn

You know plenty of people are going to run with this as The Truth. And, how could I make an argument when no methodology has been given or assumptions stated?

Justin Nelson @JustinMNelson · 1h

There's plenty of probabilistic reasoning in what I said. This is a random person w/ no background. A person taken at random will most likely not be able to do this correctly, it goes against other more established and better understood models. So, it's prob not true

@phl43 I haven't read a lot of your recent posts about this, so I'm just curious

How do you model the isolation of people with symptoms (which the govt recommends) and the quarantine of entire household where a member has shown symptoms?

Robert VerBruggen @RAVerBruggen 4h
That part is actually just a parameter you turn on in the Imperial model. When you do so some % of people don't comply but the rest reduce their contacts quite a bit.

Joseph Rachiele @Mrjjrocks · 4h
Yeah, I'm not as in the weeds as you two are, but I remember those from the Imperial model

That's why I'm wondering if Philippe assumed 0% compliance for both of those (which could explain some of the discrepancy) or did something else

Philippe Lemoine @phl43 4h
If I remember correctly, in a scenario that includes household quarantine, the model just sets transmission to zero for any individual in a household where a member is infected

Philippe Lemoine @phl43 4h
I know for sure that, in the "full lockdown" scenario I ran, this happens instantly has soon as symptoms appear and compliance is 90%. But I don't remember if I thought of including this in my "voluntary social distancing" scenario I also ran, so I will have to check

Philippe Lemoine @phl43 4h
God I hope I did because otherwise I will have to run it again 😭 But while if I didn't it will change the results, it won't change the qualitative conclusion, since again I'm sure this is done in the "full lockdown" scenario and it's still running high compared to reality.

Robert VerBruggen @RAVerBruggen 4h
Yeah. Tbh you had me at "even the full lockdown mode overpredicts deaths," which I think is also clear just from taking the Swedish team's charts and adding actual deaths, wo trying to simulate exactly what they did manage to pull off

Philippe Lemoine @phl43 · 4h
Yes, this is why I already knew before I even tried that I would reach that conclusion, but people keep talking as if this paper had never been published or it only included a "nothing changes" scenario.

Robert VerBruggen @RAVerBruggen · 4h

Dear God. Imagine the depravity required to set an occupied multi-family housing complex on fire and then trying to block fire engines from reaching the scene.

"Inside that home was a child."

"Protesters intentionally set a fire to an occupied building on Broad Street. This is not the only occupied building that has been set fire to over the last two days. But they prohibited us from getting on scene," Smith said. "We had to force our way to make a clear path for the fire department. Protestors intercepted that fire apparatus several blocks away with vehicles and blocked that fire department's access to the structure fire. Inside that home was a child."

Smith's voice filled with emotion as he recounted the event during a Sunday morning press conference.

"Officers were able to help those people out of the house. We were able to get the fire department there safely," he said before pausing to regain his composure. "When you take a legitimate issue and hijack it for unknown reasons, that is unacceptable to me. It's unacceptable to the Richmond Police Department and unacceptable to the City of Richmond."

The lesson of cov d panic's collapse is not that the Left are hypocrites it's that the instincts telling you "this isn't right" back in March were re able & you should listen to them going forward instead of always shrugging well, those guys have a graph, so they must be right

I think most of the restrictions are in a weird gray area between pure guideline and law. A lot of institutions were closed by force of law. And some people were arrested for not wearing masks. But this has mostly operated through citizens following rules.

It's really not, because it came out of a desire to listen to public health authorities. For a long time and for some very recently- they are actively encouraged to avoid outdoor spaces. And many listened. You can't have a society if social shame in public health is so selective

      Anyone who lives with/had seen the individual with COVID-19 would be a 'high risk subject'. Reconnecting HRS's is how new clusters are created. I understand why people would be frustrated and view the current activities and rhetoric as hypocritical, but the distinction is real

      Mainstream media encouraged a probabilistic curve flattening strategy. That is undeniable. Social distancing between two healthy people was absolutely encouraged, and shamed if not abided by. Why is it different now? It seems to be viewed through a binary one for convenience.

Andrew, I like you, but please leave the condescending fake respect out of this. Can you seriously not remember people getting scolded for outdoor activities? And do you think there's no risk to standing in crowded groups and speaking loudly?

For example, many churches are opening despite guidelines to the contrary. This is because many think they're constitutionally able to. Their earlier refusal was a good faith effort to follow rules. Criticizing churches but not large protests makes people think things are unfair.

I've been reading a lot of the contrarian (primarily from fellow righties) COVID19 opinions, and I wanted to work through them in good faith. I find most of them pretty unpersuasive. As they say, THREAD:

Obvious caveat: I am hardly an expert. I care about this stuff for its own sake and also because in my day job I manage (mostly) other people's money, and many of them have asked me about my v ews on the crisis as it's evolved. So here goes.

To organ ze, I'll start by summar zing the big arguments, and then I'll walk through each of them one by one, though many of these claims are related to one another.

Many people--out of a respect for social distancing--missed a parent's dying hours. If you think experiencing that--while watching mass gatherings praised by the same scolds who prevented you from seeing family--doesn't erode trust in authorities, you're actually an idiot.

Many people--out of a respect for social distancing--missed a parent's dying hours. If you think experiencing that--while watching mass gatherings praised by the same scolds who prevented you from seeing family--doesn't erode trust in authorities, you're actually an idiot.

Only in comparison - which is both the tragedy and the hilarity of it all

SamuelGoldman @SWGoldman · 22m
But there's no reason to think a Romney type would have done substantially worse if he had been nominated. The fundamental issue is that no non-incumbent Republican has won a majority of the popular vote since GHWB. And even he was a sort of an honorary incumbent.

Peter Spiliakos @petespiliakos · 15m
Except that the appeal of that message is carrying less and less conviction and that message losing purchase within the party is a symptom of its overall decline in popularity.

SamuelGoldman @SWGoldman · 13m
I don't think election results bear that out. "Trumpian" candidates who are not Trump have not done especially well, nor have consensus Republicans who didn't make a point of opposing Trump been punished

Peter Spiliakos @petespiliakos · 9m
Not sure aping particulars of Trump's style gets to Trumpianism. He really did move toward the center on issues of public spending and has hurt himself when he moved toward pre-Trump economic orthodoxy.

That tells us something about the popularity of that agenda

One final point: this obviously goes in both directions, too. When the Court removes an issue from democratic politics--just look at Obergefell--it can shift opinion pretty dramatically. Abortion has always been a fascinating outlier.

Given that most abortions are first trimester, I don't think the above is difficult to square. If your point is that public opinion is more intense with LGBT, I might agree, but not sure how to actually settle that.

Obvious caveat: I am hardly an expert. I care about this stuff for its own sake and also because in my day job I manage (mostly) other people's money, and many of them have asked me about my views on the crisis as it's evolved. So here goes.

To organize, I'll start by summarizing the big arguments, and then I'll walk through each of them one by one, though many of these claims are related to one another.

Far from being "fantasy-land," it's just obviously true. Consider any of the objective research about the pro-big business direction of the Court. Or the recent First Amendment jurisprudence invalidating efforts to limit the power of corporations in the political process.

two quick responses, @ThePlumLineGS 1 The argument in the piece you linked was about an alignment of conservatism and the working class. I didn't say anything about which party will embody that (nor do I really care which it is). Historically, it was the Democratic Party

Agree. A related point: Trump is weakest where he has embraced traditional establishment economic policy (tax reform especially). And it's telling that the most pro-life constituency among the dems are its working class voters.

1) spreader events seem to follow a weird distribution, so it's possible NYC just didn't have one at protests (but other places did) 2) conflicting trends in some places, which makes aggregate data less useful (thats actually the story of that viral paper) 3) an immunity story

   FWIW, I wouldn't say I'm certain the protests contributed to spike in most places. But in at least a few geographies (Miami, SC, LA/SF/Seattle) the local leaders and the data seem to point that way. So I find the certainty in the other direction bizarre.

   There is suspicion/evidence that up to 80% of the population is innately immune. Add that to immunity from the first wave in NYC and it's not hard to imagine NYC had something near herd immunity. The new waves (TX, AZ) are in areas that haven't experienced large waves yet.

FWIW, I wouldn't say I'm certain the protests contributed to spike in most places. But in at least a few geographies (Miami, SC, LA/SF/Seattle) the local leaders and the data seem to point that way. So I find the certainty in the other direction bizarre.

   Good afternoon JD. Your book is a touching memoir. Hillbilly Reckoning is an eye opening series of essays. The distinction I made was that how you described the people + experiences of that region did not seem to reflect my experience growing up in Appalachia. Have a nice day!

> There were many thumbs put on my scale. When I look back at my life, what jumps out is how many variables had to fall in place in order to give me a chance. There was my grandparents' constant presence, even when my mother and stepfather moved far away in an effort to shut them out. Despite the revolving door of would-be father figures, I was often surrounded by caring and kind men. Even with her faults, Mom instilled in me a lifelong love of education and learning. My sister always protected me, even after I'd physically outgrown her. Dan and Aunt Wee opened their home when I was too afraid to ask. Long before that, they were the first real exemplars of a happy and loving marriage. There were teachers, distant relatives, and friends.

Skepticism about the lockdowns is of course largely merited and right for conservatives to voice, but it should be mixed with articulating an approach to enjoying mostly just hanging out with your own family which all in all is a pretty traditional American approach to life

To organize, I'll start by summarizing the big arguments, and then I'll walk through each of them one-by-one, though many of these claims are related to one another.

I've been reading a lot of the contrarian (primarily from fellow righties) COVID19 opinions, and I wanted to work through them in good faith. I find most of them pretty unpersuasive. As they say, THREAD:

Lauren, where in my entire book did I claim to use "bootstraps"? I am quite sure the word doesn't exist in the book, and equally certain that I explicitly criticize the view you assign to me. Here's a passage from the actual book I wrote:

> There were many thumbs put on my scale. When I look back at my life, what jumps out is how many variables had to fall in place in order to give me a chance. There was my grandparents' constant presence, even when my mother and stepfather moved far away in an effort to shut them out. Despite the revolving door of would-be father figures, I was often surrounded by caring and kind men. Even with her faults, Mom instilled in me a lifelong love of education and learning. My sister always protected me, even after I'd physically outgrown her. Dan and Aunt Wee opened their home when I was too afraid to ask. Long before that, they were the first real exemplars of a happy and loving marriage. There were teachers, distant relatives, and friends.

Here's data from four different cities. Four different reopening regimes. Four different climates. They all curiously saw a big spike starting in early June. The confidence that protests haven't contributed to the spread of COVID is premature, and stupid.

First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways.

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked.

I've been reading a lot of the contrarian (primarily from fellow righties) COVID19 opinions, and I wanted to work through them in good faith. I find most of them pretty unpersuasive. As they say, THREAD:

Obvious caveat. I am hardly an expert. I care about this stuff for its own sake and also because in my day job I manage (mostly) other people's money, and many of them have asked me about my views on the crisis as it's evolved. So here goes

To organize, I'll start by summarizing the big arguments, and then I'll walk through each of them one by one, though many of these claims are related to one another.
